ATLANTIC RICE MILLS.

HAVE STARED ON THEIR SEASON'S WORK.

WILL BE KEPT BUSY FOR MONTHS.

One of the Largest and Most Modern Mills in the United States.

Yesterday afternoon the Atlantic had the first bag of rice to her hoppers and entered season's run without a detour. The network of machinery, like a spider's web through stories of height. The first of the powerful 225 horse engines was a signal to the overlying ware rooms of rough rice that their days of natural state were drawing to an end yet many busy weeks must pass before the last sack submits to being stripped of nature's protecting jacket and pass into the commercial world to furnish material for the speculator and food for the consumer.

The Atlantic Rice Mill is a magnificent brick structure measuring 100 feet from basement to the roof above. The building proper is 150x250 two stories in height. Towering above this is the milling department, five stories in height. The first floor of the spacious structure is used for a rough rice storage room and will accommodate 100,000 bags of rice. The second story is of equal capacity and will furnish a home for the clean product after passing through the different processes necessary to its manufacture.

The engine and boiler are securely housed in a brick room built east of the main building and the basement used for the shafting and the proper transmission of power to the different sections of the building. The engine is of 225 horse power fed by a 250 horse power Babcock tubular boiler. On this floor is also located an electric motor of 15,000 light capacity, capable of furnishing the entire mill with all the light necessary for its operation day and night. The motor is attached to an individual engine and boiler, which makes it possible to keep the lights running at a comparatively small cost and trouble, even though the other machinery might be at a standstill. The fuel question is easily and economically solved by running the chaff taken from the rice in the rough state into what is called a Dutch oven, which, owing to its peculiar construction, utilizes every particle of heat and creates sufficient steam to run the entire plant without additional fuel to waste. Water is pumped from the river near by through an eight inch main and deposited into an underground tank of 10,000 gallon capacity and from there injected into the boiler. The mill and cottages are supplied with a private system of sewerage emptying into the river, the overflow and exhaust being discharged into the sewerage pipe, creating a constant overflow, keeping the pipes open and acting in every way as a constant flush.

The machinery is drawn by three main shafts placed on every alternate floor, and so arranged that each shaft distributes its power over two floors, economizing in room and giving more satisfactory results. The boxings are equipped with adjustable ring rollers that are only visited by the oil can once in a week, but furnish an even and constant flow that has the economical provision of furnishing any desired amount of lubricant without danger of waste.

The second story of the milling department is the hulling and finishing room; the third bin and clean rice department and in the fourth and fifth is stationed the rough and clean rice separating rooms and cleaning machinery.

The mill is equipped with a duplicate set of rice clippers that first receive the rice and extract all loose straw and other substances that the farmer failed to separate with the threshing machine. The refuse is collected and carried away to feed the furnaces below. Were it not for this provision rice that had not been properly threshed would suffer a loss in the separators.

Two modern Howes and Smith graders stand ready to receive the rice when it is turned out of the mill polished and separate the cereal into the various grades ranging from the straight run to what is known as a triple fancy head. Like all other parts of the mill these parts are equipped with automatic cleaners which eliminate a great deal of labor and time. The netting of elevators passing to and from all the different machines and sections of the mill are constructed of matched poplar securely held together with screws and finished in hard oil. Not a nail has been used in their construction and this minor detail illustrates the substantial manner in which every part of the mill, no matter how insignificant, has been built.

Scattered in different parts of the mill are sixteen cyclone dust collectors which collect the dust and loose grain. By means of the conical shape of the collectors and the revolving upward shoot of the draft, the dust is carried out above and what ever grain is found mixed in the collection is drawn by force of gravity into the pockets below, which makes it almost impossible for a grain to be lost from the time the farmer unloads his rice until it makes its journey over five floors and through countless feet of conveyors and delivered into the sacks polished and ready for the market.

By using the first floor for rough rice and the second for clean, one grade can be received from cars stationed on the Kansas City Southern and Southern Pacific tracks below while cleaned rice is being loaded from the ware room above and this receiving and delivering process being carried on at one and the same time without the usual confusion and delays incidental to transactions of such magnitude.

The Atlantic Rice Mill is what is termed a sectional or duplicate mill. Through this arrangement one section of the mill can be in operation while the other is at a stand still, or to be more plainly stated, two mills combined in one. This sectional idea is carried out through the entire plant, and not a piece of machinery in the mill save the boiler and engine below but what is in duplicate and capable of being operated independent of the other half. The mill has an hourly capacity of 100 sacks or 2400 sacks a day. The Atlantic Rice Mill is a substantial monument to the city and the benefits that will be derived both directly and indirectly from its operation can hardly be calculated. Suffice it to say that few cities can boast of its equal and none can surpass it in point of cost or size.

Gustave A. Jahn, president of the Atlantic Rice Milling company, arrived in the city this morning indirectly from New York, and is assisting the local manager, Mr. John S. Barton, in getting things in well regulated running order. The company from president down is offered with experienced rice men who thoroughly understand their business and have such a standing in the business world that the Atlantic Rice Mill is not a venture but as stable as the rice industry itself.

CARPENTERS' BALL POSTPONED.

On account of the extremely disagreeable weather last night the ball to be given by the Carpenters' and Joiners at their new hall on Pearl street was postponed until next Tuesday night. About two dozen couples were present but owing to the fact that a great many of the carpenters lived out in the suburban districts a full attendance could not be had and it was decided to postpone the event to next Tuesday night when it is hoped that the weather will be more favorable.
